PATHS TO PARTICIPATION

How to help hunters and target shooters try new shooting sports activities.
The purpose of this project is to help improve hunting and shooting sports marketing efforts by describing how current hunters and shooters can be encouraged to try other shooting activities. To achieve this, a custom survey was fielded through NSSF partner organizations from June 2017 to August 2017. Qualified survey respondents were those who participated in hunting or recreational shooting at least once within the past three years. Qualified respondents were then asked questions about their introduction and evolution through various hunting and shooting activities. Previous and current activities, as well as activities they would be interested in trying, were all evaluated. All individuals in this analysis were at least moderately interested in the addressed activity, as determined by a survey question.

The sample for this study included individuals recruited by NSSF partner organizations. The results are not representative of the population of hunters and shooters, but rather the constituency of NSSF’s partner organizations. The results are not meant to be representative of all hunters and shooters, but instead were designed to support hunter and shooter retention efforts by explaining interest levels in new shooting sports activities and how to best help current hunters and shooters try new activities.

As a result, these results do not focus on how to recruit new, first time participants to the hunting and shooting sports, but instead focus on how to encourage our current customers to try new activities.
Introduction

As is normal, people frequently take on new recreational activities and drop others. As the shooting sports industry, the concern is our customers might drop shooting sports completely. The purpose of this study was to identify opportunities and tactics to encourage current customers to try new forms of hunting and shooting activities.

Hunters generally want to try new hunting activities that are not readily available in their home region. For example, the biggest interest for pig hunting comes from the Midwest while the greatest interest in elk and waterfowl hunting is in the South. While this makes sense, given the costs associated with travel, interest still exists in hunting different species or trying new methods close to home. For target shooting, there is little difference across the regions. Overall, the greatest interest in trying new shooting activities lies within the South and the Midwest. The many types of hunting and shooting activities available to promote are presented within this report.

There are a few hunting and shooting activities where the majority want to try it for the first time, such as target shooting with a crossbow or pig hunting. Accessibility, time and knowing how to get started are some of the most common hurdles we need to help our customers overcome. For those that want to hunt, it’s difficult to find convenient and affordable lands, while target shooters often have trouble finding a local range offering the activities they are interested in trying. Both shooters and hunters hesitate in buying equipment needed for new activities before they try the sport. These and other issues are also outlined within this report.

This report presents a wealth of information. Recognizing most hunting and shooting sports programs and organizations focus on specific types of activities, after some brief overall insights, details are presented for specific types of hunting and shooting sports.
Key takeaways regarding how to help hunters and target shooters try new activities:

- Create easy access – Create mobile apps and online tools to help them find places to hunt or local shooting ranges, make reservations, rent equipment, etc. In addition, create beginner apps or voice-activated assistants, like Google Assistant or Amazon’s Alexa, that answer questions, such as what to do with their harvest, where to rent equipment, how to aim and shoot, as well as advanced level apps on perfecting their skills. Provide equipment rentals, hunting guides and group shooting / hunting events or programs that allow them to try the sport.

- Be simplistic / convenient – Promote how it can fit in their busy schedules, such as “way to spend time with family,” and “spend more time outdoors” and offer more close-to-home experiences. The easier an activity appears, the more simple and convenient it becomes.

- Influence through their friends and peers – Hunting and shooting are social activities. Very few will participate if they do not see their friends or others like themselves participating. Leverage non-professionals’ hunting and shooting videos, photos and stories through social media platforms (Instagram, Facebook, YouTube), blogs, magazines and share through television programs. Encourage friends to connect at the field or at the range.

- Promote unique experiences – Collaborate with cross-industry retailers, organizations and manufacturers to create events or experiences that current customers will want to make time for.

- Educate through augmented reality / video – To give a lasting impression on what it’s like to experience new hunting and shooting activities, simulate the experience at outdoor retailers, state fairs or other outdoor events where current customers gather, or showcase professionals hunting or shooting via online video on YouTube.

Thank you for your interest in helping advance hunting and shooting sports.
Messaging Opportunity:
Promote how activities are a way to spend time with friends and family and spend more time outdoors. It’s always been an interest, so now is the time for them to do it! Do not promote an activity as a solo effort, or complicated.

Turkey Hunting

A look at how to help those interested, but have not tried the sport.
OVERVIEW – Moving People Into Turkey Hunting

Affluent, middle-aged hunters and shooters are interested in turkey hunting, especially those that live in the South.

Less than 1% has experience in turkey hunting. Their father introduced them to the sport and nearly half of hunters started with small game. Currently, a significant amount are using either a traditional rife or a shotgun for deer or upland game hunting.

Target shooters were also introduced by their father and started with plinking/informal target shooting. Although they desire to hunt with a shotgun, they have more experience using a traditional rifle.

Both hunters and shooters have been influenced by their friends to try new activities, but not having a convenient place to hunt and not having anyone to go with have been preventing them from trying the sport.

Since wild turkeys are available in most forested areas in the south, opening up new areas near urban areas via public access programs and creating group hunt programs may be an opportunity. In addition, stories on professionals’ and non-professionals’ turkey hunts and promoting how-to information via television, magazines and newsletters may motivate them as well.

10% Bear
9% Other Big Game
4% Wild pig
16% Others

83% currently hunt with a traditional rifle and 80% hunt with a shotgun. Over half (57%) say their father took them on their first hunt and half of them started with small game and one-third started with upland game. More than three fourths (88%) have tried at least one other activity. For those that did, it took between two to five years for 37% of them to try a new species and only one season for 22% of them.
MOVING TARGET SHOOTERS TO TURKEY HUNTING
Two-thirds (66%) of shooters say their father introduced them to the sport and 82% started with plinking. Then, within two to five years, 36% of shooters tried a new activity and 26% branched out within a year. Shooters are more likely to use a traditional rifle or a semi-automatic handgun for their shooting activities. Less than half (49%) are currently using a shotgun for plinking and 23% are using one for sighting-in.

Q: What shooting activities are you participating in now? Within the past three years. (N=1,292). Who took you shooting for the first time? (N=1,505). How long did you participate in your first shooting activity before trying something else? (N=1,470)
PATHS TO TURKEY HUNTING
These hunters and shooters need a helping hand. They are looking to others to take them hunting, show them where they can go and how to get started. In addition, 16% indicated that their hunting skills need improving. They have no problems with the cost, but having enough time to try it is an issue for some. Promoting turkey hunting in advance of spring and fall seasons may help some reserve the time in advance before other non-hunting activities take that time.

Q: Why haven’t you tried hunting this species? (N=708).
HOW TO HELP THEM TRY TURKEY HUNTING

40% “An invitation from a friend / family member”

34% “Books / Magazines”

34% “Program offered by a state wildlife agency”

28% “YouTube videos”

26% “Join a local hunt club”

26% “Membership in a non-profit organization that is specific to this activity”

24% “Program offered by an outdoor retailer”

19% “Online forums / blogs”

55% of hunters and 49% of shooters say “friends” are the greatest influence in trying new types of hunting and shooting activities. Generating awareness through editorial content (sharing hunting stories) in print and video, word-of-mouth through family and friends, providing programs hosted by outdoor retailers, state wildlife agencies and other nonprofit organizations will help people try the sport.

Q: What would help you get into the hunt that you are interested in? (N=1,509); When it comes to individuals, who has the greatest influence on you with regard to trying different species or trying new hunting methods? (N=1,469). When it comes to individuals, who has the greatest influence on you with regard to trying different types of shooting? (N=1,3,20).
